SECTION I: READING COMPREHENSION

READ THE TWO TEXTS BELOW AND DO THE RELATED TASKS

Text 1

It has long been a painful rite of passage for German schoolchildren – learning “die Schreibschrift”, a fiddly form of joined-up handwriting all pupils are expected to have mastered by the time they leave primary school. But many German teachers have had enough, insisting it is a waste of time to force children to learn a cursive script when they have already learned to print letters at kindergarten. Furthermore, they say, the joined-up handwriting is often illegible.

The national primary schoolteachers’ union has started a campaign to abolish compulsory teaching of Schreibschrift. “It’s completely unnecessary, a deadweight tradition,” according to the union’s deputy chairman, Ulrich Hecker. He wants other states to follow Hamburg’s lead, which recently took the rather radical step of introducing a new, easier alphabet called “die Grundschrift” that can take children all the way from tracing their first letters to full fluency in adulthood.

It is an idea some German scholars consider culturally traitorous. “Joined-up handwriting trains fine motor skills, develops [a sense for] aesthetics. An apparently easier script also simplifies thoughts. I would mourn the loss of a piece of our writing culture,” Dr Hans Kaufmann, regional head of the Society for German Language in Hamburg, told Bild newspaper.

When they start school, most German children begin by getting to grips with holding a pencil and then printing individual letters. At the end of the first year they are then introduced to the cursive script. “It means they have to learn two scripts one after another, which wastes time and interrupts the learning process,” said Hecker. “With Grundschrift, they start with one script and stick with it.”

Whereas some countries do not have a national script, Germany has developed its own style of handwriting. Before the Second World War, Germans wrote in the highly decorative Sütterlin script.

In 1953, West German children began to be taught “lateinische Ausgangsschrift”, a more legible joined-up script. Over in East Germany, the “Schulausgangsschrift” (model school script) was introduced. When the two Germanies became one, the handwriting was also unified, and since 1993 the “Vereinfachte Ausgangsschrift” (easier model script) has been on the syllabus.

Text 2

Traditionally, many linguists stressed the importance of mastering grammar structures first while teaching English. In recent years, the majority of educators have become more aware of the fallacy of this approach and other approaches promoting vocabulary development have gained popularity. It has been found out without vocabulary to put on top of the grammar system, the learners can actually say very little despite being able to manipulate complex grammatical structures in exercise drills.

It is obvious that to learn English, one needs to learn many words. Native speakers have a vocabulary of about 20,000 words but foreign learners of English need far fewer. They need only about 5,000 words to be quite competent in speaking and listening. The reason for this seemingly small number is the nature of words and the frequency with which they appear in a language. It seems clear that frequent words should be among the first words to learn because they will be met most often and will be needed in speech or writing.
